CASEY'S DAY

Can you imagine having your favorite outfit taken away from you and being told you weren't allowed to wear it anymore? How would you feel? Angry? Sad? That wouldn't be fair, would it?

Throughout the Bible, God is clear that justice—or making things right again—is very important to him. In our world, many things are difficult and broken by sin. But God tells us that he is at work restoring justice, and he invites each of us to help him make things right wherever and whenever we can. One way we can make things right is by knowing the sad stories of the past and by doing better today.

About fifty years ago, a little girl named Phyllis had to leave her home on the Dog Creek Indian Reserve in British Columbia, Canada, and go to school far away. Her Grannie bought her a special orange shirt to wear because orange was Phyllis's favorite color. However, at the school, the people in charge would not let Phyllis wear her special orange shirt. Phyllis cried and asked to have it back, but no one listened.

Beginning in the 1870s, the Canadian government forced thousands of Indigenous children like Phyllis to attend religious residential schools, where they lived away from their communities. This same thing happened to Native Americans in the United States. The students at these schools experienced many injustices. They were not allowed to wear their special clothes from home. They were not allowed to speak the language they grew up knowing. They were forced to cut their hair short. Even worse, children were not allowed to leave during the school year, and parents were not allowed to visit. There are now rules in place so these things never happen again to children in school.

What happened to Phyllis and so many other Indigenous/Native American children was very wrong. So, how can we “see that justice is done” today for what happened in the past? Part of doing justice today begins with remembering past injustices—to make sure these kinds of things don't happen again. In September, people in Canada recognize Orange Shirt Day—a day to remember the injustices of residential schools. In honor of Phyllis and so many other Indigenous children, people wear orange shirts on September 30th and together, they lament. A lament is a prayer that remembers the past and expresses sorrow and pain.

God calls us to look for opportunities each day to “see that justice is done, let mercy be [our] first concern, and humbly obey [our] God.” This might mean speaking up when you see someone being put down, bullied, or teased. It could look like comforting someone who is hurt or listening to someone’s sad story and lamenting with them. And there are bound to be times when we ourselves act unjustly too and hurt others. But we can always ask others and Jesus for forgiveness and pray for God’s help to love better and walk humbly with him each day.

Prayer

Creator God, each of us is loved by you. You call us all by name because we are your children. We pray for the survivors and families of Residential Schools. Our hearts break for the terrible things that happened to people there. Please shine your light in the darkness. Give us the courage to speak for those who are silenced and to walk with those who feel alone. Forgive us for the ways we have caused others to feel less than who they are. Strengthen us as brothers and sisters of One Creator in the family of God. Hiy, Hiy (Thank you). Amen.
